Husband won’t change his ways unless he admits affairs with women is wrong

Dear Annie:

Two years ago, I caught my husband having an emotional affair with a friend of ours. Even though we went through counseling and he told me he would never contact her, he lied. He continued to lie for almost a year, even during our counseling sessions. In one session, he tried to blame me for his actions, and after six months, he still refused to take any responsibility for the affair.

This whole thing has made me not trust him. I recently met someone new from an ex-classmate from high school. He said he wished he had been a better person, that he had been a better person, that he was no longer in contact with her, he lied. He continued to lie for almost a year, even during our counseling sessions. In one session, he tried to blame me for his actions, and after six months, he still refused to take any responsibility for the affair.

Right now, your husband cannot be trusted to be faithful or honest. He won’t change unless he recognizes and admits that his behavior is wrong. Please go back to your counselor on your own and discuss what you can live with, whether you believe your husband will grow up anytime soon, and what the best course of action is for you.

Dear Annie: This is in response to “Never the Better Office,” whose mother skips family gatherings because she would rather stay home by the phone waiting for a better offer from a potential suitor.

If Mom does not have a cellphone, they should give her one as a gift and pay for a year’s service. Then Mom will no longer have an excuse for missing out with family and friends, because she will still get her calls and can easily arrange for a short-notice date. — Mollie.

Dear Disappointed:

Heartbroken, Dear Disappointed: You aren’t wrong to be upset, but whether or not to divorce him is a more difficult choice. Men often don’t realize how hurtful an emotional affair can be. They don’t understand that it is still a betrayal, and consequently, they don’t always do the necessary work to heal the marriage from what they justify as a harmless flirtation.

Right now, your husband cannot be trusted to be faithful or honest. He won’t change unless he recognizes and admits that his behavior is wrong. Please go back to your counselor on your own and discuss what you can live with.
